Peptides are short chains of amino acids, which are the building blocks of proteins. These amino acids are linked together by peptide bonds, forming a sequence that typically consists of fewer than 50 amino acids (longer chains are considered proteins). Peptides play vital roles in many biological processes, including hormone regulation, immune function, and cell signaling.

Biological Functions of Peptides: Peptides serve a wide range of roles in the body. Some of the key functions include:

- 1) Hormonal Functions: Many hormones are peptides, including insulin, glucagon, and growth hormone. These peptides regulate important processes like metabolism, growth, and immune response.
- 2) Neurotransmitters: Some peptides act as neurotransmitters, such as endorphins (which are involved in pain relief and pleasure) or substance P (which is involved in pain perception).
- 3) Immune System Modulation: Defensins and cathelicidins are antimicrobial peptides that play important roles in the body's immune defense, helping to fight infections.
- 4) Cell Signaling: Peptides like growth factors are involved in cell signaling, influencing processes such as cell division, differentiation, and tissue repair.
- 5) Antimicrobial Peptides: Some peptides act as antibiotics, with the ability to kill or inhibit the growth of bacteria, fungi, or viruses. These include host-defense peptides produced by the body.

Types of Peptides:

- 1) Endogenous Peptides: These are naturally occurring in the body. For example, insulin, oxytocin, and glucagon.
- 2) Synthetic Peptides: These are manufactured in laboratories and used for medical research, treatments, or as drugs. GLP-1 analogs (used in diabetes management) are examples of synthetic peptides.
- 3) Peptide Drugs: Some peptides are used as medications to treat diseases. Examples include exenatide (used in diabetes), bivaliru-din (an anticoagulant), and hormone replacement therapies.

Peptides in Medicine:

Peptide Hormones: Used for conditions like diabetes (insulin), growth hormone deficiencies, and infertility treatments.

Peptide-based Therapies: Peptides can act as drugs, especially in areas like cancer treatment, autoimmune diseases, and pain management.

Peptide Vaccines: Peptides are used in the development of vaccines by triggering immune responses.

Cosmetic Peptides: Peptides are used in skincare products, especially those aimed at reducing wrinkles and improving skin elasticity.

Peptide Synthesis: Peptide synthesis can be done through various methods, including solid-phase peptide synthesis (SPPS) or liquid-phase methods.

These allow for the creation of custom peptides in research or drug development.

Conclusion:

Peptides are critical molecules in the body, playing roles in hormonal regulation, immune defense, cell communication, and neurotransmission.

Due to their diverse functions, peptides are used in medical treatments, research, and even cosmetics. The study and use of peptides are rapidly expanding, offering promising therapeutic opportunities. Regulations are forever changing in the peptide world. PHC will keep you updated on peptides and availability.

ORAL GLP-1s -SEE ONLINE PORTAL

Clinical Relevance of GLP-1 (Glucagon-Like Peptide-1)

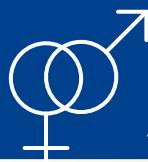

Type 2 Diabetes: GLP-1 is a target for diabetes treatments because it helps regulate blood sugar.

GLP-1 receptor agonists (drugs that mimic GLP-1) are used to improve glycemic control.

Weight Management: GLP-1 receptor agonists, like semaglutide and liraglutide, are also approved for obesity management because of their appetite-suppressing effects.

Cardiovascular Benefits: GLP-1 receptor agonists have been shown to reduce the risk of cardiovascular events in people with diabetes and heart disease.
